Note to Facilitator about the Pre-Assessment Evaluation and Section Quizzes.

1. The Pre-Assessment Evaluation should be given at the beginning of the training session, before any training has begun, and before viewing the video program. The purpose of the Pre-Assessment Evaluation is to discover what participants' ideas about diversity are before training, and compare it to what they've learned after training. This could be a good indicator also of whether a participant needs further training on the subject.

2. The Section Quizzes are short tests that reflect what each participant has learned from the referenced video section. They should be used to generate discussion and to see how well the participants are learning the material. The Master Answer Keys are at the end of the Leader's Guide.

ROLE-PLAYING SCENARIOS

STEREOTYPES

All your coworkers love to joke around with each other. One day, an overweight coworker seems sad, in a bad mood. Before you can talk to her, a coworker tells her to cheer up, that “people like her are supposed to be jolly, not downers.” She obviously doesn’t think it’s funny, and they both turn to you. What do you say?

One day at lunch break you’re hanging around with several coworkers outside. One man, who is a bit older, is having a hard time getting his obviously new cell phone to do what he wants it to do. You notice and try to help. He becomes offended and tells you that just because he is older, he is perfectly capable of figuring out how to use his new phone. What do you say to him?

FOR PREVIEW ONLY

You come across two coworkers talking in the hallway. One is African American and the other is Mexican American. They are obviously joking with each other, saying things such as “All you Mexicans want to do is knife fight and steal” and “Yeah, you black guys call each other brother because you probably all had the same father and don’t know it.” You notice that a young woman is working nearby, and is obviously becoming offended but won’t say anything. What do you say or do?

SIMILARITIES

A coworker approaches you, and wants to talk. She feels kind of left out in her department because she's the only woman. In her opinion, the men don't treat her the same as they treat each other, so she tends to stay quiet and spend time with other women from other departments when she can. She is thinking of transferring because of it. What do you say to her?

You love the fact that your workplace is very diverse, but some coworkers' behaviors don't fit into your personal moral belief system. You've reached a dilemma because they approach you to join them and hang out, but you feel like you would be compromising what you believe in. On the other hand, you know they are good people. They ask you to come out with them tonight. What do you say to them?

FOR PREVIEW ONLY

One coworker in your workplace really annoys you. You have nothing in common with her, and actually don't enjoy anything she likes, which she talks about all the time. You feel like you can just ignore her, but by doing that, your coworker is now rude to you. What do you say or do?

UNITY

Nobody in your workplace really rallies and gets enthusiastic about teamwork. Many people are secretive and private about what they are working on, even though you are all working on the same project, and sharing ideas would help you all. Morale seems down, and you want to do something about it. What do you do?

You notice that John, a coworker who has a mental disability, seems upset and quiet. Usually he's very fun, talkative, and very good at his job. You approach him and try to say hello, but he just leaves. A new coworker approaches you and says "Why does the company hire people like that? We need people who can actually think to do their job here. He's a waste of space." What do you say to her?

FOR PREVIEW ONLY

Your workplace is very diverse, but you've noticed a trend lately. The younger employees and the older employees aren't really working together that much any more. The young people seem to only want to hang out with each other, work near each other and be with each other at breaks. You've even seen younger employees bypass older employees to consult with people of their own age, even though the older employees have much more experience. At the same time, you've also noticed that the older employees have seen the same thing, and seem either hurt or resentful. You know this could damage morale and even productivity. What do you do?

BENEFITS

You distrust a coworker because he is from another country and has a thick accent. You don't want to work with him because you fear he might slow you down and also make your coworkers tease you about him. The man comes to your desk and asks if you could help him with some problems he is having. You notice some coworkers watching and smiling. What do you do or say to the man?

You've noticed lately that everyone you work with on your project thinks the same. It's like you are all stale, and have run out of ideas. You don't want to go to any other project group for help because they are too busy with their own project, but don't know how to solve the problem. You are stymied, and getting worried about your upcoming deadline. What do you do to kick-start your group?

FOR PREVIEW ONLY

Lately, you've been receiving more and more calls from clients from other countries, international clients. The tech support team and marketing team did recently announce a global Internet marketing push, so that may be why. Most speak your language, but many have very thick accents. Although you want to help, you sometimes have trouble understanding them, and you lose customers. You worry about that, but can't think of a solution. You don't really know anyone in the company that makes calls like you because you are a very private person. But your sales are going down. What do you do?
